And speaking familiarly they were pondering recalling music from previous shows more generally: In many ways (perhaps coincidentally) Matthew sums it up for us 30+ annual Star Trek fans. We LOVE Star Trek: Enterprise as a standalone series and we believe it deserved more than four seasons. But the truth is this: I don't care about the reboot movies or prequels worth serving up. And as we first talked about the show and talked to CBS, we said we were initially just calling character number one because in the '60s, in the first pilot, Gene Roddenberry was very progressive and had a female first officer. But I'm very excited about the music, music is incredibly important. The overall shape of the series was discussed, and perhaps the most interesting is the idea that it might not simply play as an in-universe year in a season like all the previous Trek has: I recommend never twenty-six episodes; I think he'd get tired on the show. Ideally, I'd like to do ten episodes, I think it's a narrower story. Which led to this interesting and puzzling comment about the potential other ways CBS All Access could bring more Trek. With the exception of Deep Space Nine, when the Dominion went to war, when it was highly serialized, Star Trek was primarily episodic. So I feel like we're going to be different in this regard, in this series. But time is something that I think we will have the opportunity to play in an unusual way. Finally, there was some talk about the format of the series and whether more episodes could happen next season.
